AROUND THE WORLD

Artemis II The Moon Crew Stacks Up.

NASA placed the Orion spacecraft at the top of the SLS rocket as an official stack in the Artemis 2 mission. The four astronauts are in the last quarantine measures despite being the pioneering people to travel to the Moon in a period of more than 50 years. The mission will not be a landing but a fly-by around the dark side of the moon, which will test lifestyle-support systems in deep space in space missions.

Blindsight" Chip Success Neuralink: "Neuralink" Success.

The Neuralink by Elon Musk has reportedly been successful in doing a test on the human eye known as the Blindsight, which uses the neuralink to create a video feed by bypassing a damaged optic nerve into the visual cortex. One individual who went ten years blind received an example of low-resolution image perception referred to as digital vision which has been termed as similar to seeing the world in 8-bit retro vision.

Hardware The Wearable Era of the Phoneless Phones.

At annual Connect event, Meta launched the so-called Orion holographic glasses which was a stand-alone device that replaces the smartphone completely. With a real-world overlay visual and a wristband that one can control through his or her neural, industry experts have termed the product as an iPhone moment in augmented reality.

Energy: PSCs Comes into Business.

Perovskite-silicon tandem solar panels Mass productions of perovskite-silicon tandem solar panels with 35% efficiency have been initiated by a United Kingdom based startup, compared to the standard 22%. These printable and cheap solar sheets can be attached on building facades and electric vehicles, and would potentially turn urban surfaces into distributed power sources.

Artificial Intelligence Cracks the Invisible Language.

Archeologists have used a new pattern-recognition AI to decode the so-called Linear A script of early Minoans which was previously incomprehensible. The language system revealed the patterns of language that are never seen by humans and it turned out that most tablets consist of taxation and a list of inventory that updates the knowledge about the economies of the Bronze Age.
